Preface - A journey to redivine every life

Welcome to Redivine Life, faith for the logical mind. This book is for people of every religion, philosophy, and discipline. Those of physics, biology, sociology, and mathematics will see their truths represented within it, as will those of world theologies. Teachings are consistent with all of these views because this guidebook details our one ultimate reality, All That Is.

Our first section establishes the foundation of world faith, connects our spiritual and religious schools, and harmonizes these views with today's logical perspectives. Section two overlays an empowering intellectual framework that logically explains profound truths of the ancients. We apply this wisdom to claim the peace of God, quantum wisdom, power of the prophets, enduring health, and more. The third section details the Rosetta of God's good order that validates all wholesome prophecies and empowers us to fulfill them.

Redivine Life continues the journey of Be Your Greatest Self, our guide to enlightenment and legendary life. As with our first book, we provide many advanced perspectives society has not seen. There are countless profound discoveries within these pages. Be sure to use the Enhanced Personal Journal that supplemented book one, and summarize these insights in the Enlightening Strikes section. If you do not have a journal, or have chosen to begin with this second book, a dedicated notebook will be very useful.

Guru sessions at www.RedivineLife.com clarify advanced concepts. Passwords to access these lessons are in this guidebook. Read and ponder each chapter before viewing the optional online content.

Section 1 - Path of the prophets

Imagine a life defined by completeness, synergy, and empowerment instead of limits. Envision knowing the path to every wholesome objective, and having the means to achieve it. Consider the joy and inspiration that would arise in such a life, and know that this is where we are going.

Dear friend, buried deep within teachings of our saints and prophets, there is a model of reality that is as elegant as it is profound. In the embrace of this empowering view, we transcend society's limits to claim blissful happiness, the whole sum of good health, infinitely glorious relationships, and success beyond measure. We wholly and permanently redivine life.

As we begin, recognize that the language of the prophets hasn't been a living and spoken medium for nearly two-thousand years. The meaning of essential metaphors has eroded, and must be restored for ancient wisdom to be leveraged. Lessons in this section translate these ancient metaphors into today's language of logic and reason, establishing our foundation. A few initial insights will seem like a review of what we know; this is wonderful, for it reveals that we are aligned with and perceiving the view of our saints and prophets. It isn't long after we've established our bearing that we delve into the spectacular.

Chapter 1: All That Is

If perception was reality, we would need neither science nor religion. There is more than we perceive there to be; there is what is, and it exists no matter our beliefs. It is this ultimate reality that science explores, the very same reality saints and prophets detailed.

With the advancement of human intellect, many ancients realized that we do not experience what exists; rather, a belief-based viewpoint is derived from sensation and processed introspectively. These wise ones taught of the Almighty that precedes our concepts and perceptions, and an endless array of metaphors ensued. There was Hu, creator of hu-man beings; Amen, the unified god of Egypt; Ra, the ultimate god of light; and mother nature, our source and provider. Today's metaphors for our ultimate reality include Yahweh, Allah, Brahman, Jah, Izanami, Jehovah, and Ik Onkar. These figures and the teachings surrounding them form our world religions. In a sense, every religion is a sacred philosophy that explains All That Is and helps us excel throughout life.

Over countless millennia, a plethora of non-deified philosophies also developed. These teachings focus on a path and way of being, providing clarity on how we happily and harmoniously live within everything, a common term for this ultimate reality. Confucianism, Taoism, and Buddhism follow this non-deified approach. In recent times, many have placed faith in science, another set of non-deified explanations that detail All That Is.

A vast selection of philosophies, deified and not, have detailed the nature of existence and explained how we realize the ultimate life. When we can rely on these models, we don't have to figure out all of reality's details, and when the models perform as intended, we are empowered. This is the might of religions, science, and other sacred philosophies. Completeness, synergy, and empowerment arise when philosophical models prove accurate, for we use them to relate and align with All That Is.

Fingers pointing to the One

Many years ago, it was revealed to me that God is All That Is, and there is nothing that is not God. All schools of thought formed to explain this one ultimate reality. This wisdom places scripture in a logical context, enabling us to intellectually interpret teachings of past and present guides. It also reveals our astounding relationship with the divine. Our entire life is a matter of relation with All That Is, and what an important relationship this is; the wholesomeness of this bond determines how glorious life becomes.

We can demonstrate that God is All That Is and there is nothing that is not God, for scriptural teachings collectively validate this lesson. Let's examine this foundational truth in accordance with assorted world religions and philosophical schools.

While reading each of the following lines, replace the name of the Almighty with the one you know. If you recognize the divine as Jah, Allah, Jehovah, or Ik Onkar, then say or think that name when you read another like word. If you follow no deified religion, replace these divine terms with the word reality or everything. Reflect and examine this teaching; we explore deeper insights after our reference point is clearly established.

- We are born into and of All That Is; this is God the father, and mother earth as well.
- God is our sole provider; from what other everything would all things come?
- The words 'Allah is great' refer to the fact there is nothing greater than what fundamentally exists, All That Is.

- An act of God is an event that happens within everything.
- Jesus was son of God, as are we all children of God. We are born into and of All That Is.
- God is de vine and we are de fruit. Because all within de fruit comes from de vine, we are divine within.
- God is in us and we are in God, or similarly, we are one of the many who are the one.
- We cannot hide from God because there is nowhere else to go; everywhere is God.
- Finally, God is the creator, the source. All we say, think, know, and are, and all we've yet to discover... all of this is an aspect of what exists beyond the senses. It is not what we think exists, but what actually is... All That Is.

People of certain faiths may appreciate further clarification, for though we have long been taught of the divine power, we may have been given a specific name and told to reject other terms. There is a reason for this. A metaphor has a definition attached to it, and to establish clear understanding, the term we use mustn't be burdened by past misconceptions. The teachings of Muhammad serve as an exceptional example.

When Muhammad was enlightening others, the common term for God had a definition in the hearts of followers that was inconsistent with his divine teachings. He needed to convey his wisdom without established misconceptions getting in the way, so he taught of Allah instead of God. It would seem these people observe a different deity, yet ask Muhammad's followers if theirs is the God of Abraham, and we'll be told yes. Many a faith was born in Abraham's house, and they all teach of the one God. Every faith does.

To love the lord thy God

Much is revealed when we clearly understand divine terms. Recognizing that God is All That Is, and thereby all inclusive of everything, we see that all we love or have ever experienced is of God. Every joy is of God, as is every comfort. That's a pretty big deal, isn't it? Now consider that every time we express hatred or pass judgement, we do so upon God. Jesus' guidance to turn the other cheek now makes a lot more sense, yet it remains difficult to do this, for there are some who don't act so divinely, some we have trouble loving.

We overcome this limitation when we understand divine relation. It's not enough to simply know that God exists, we must move into relation and help others do likewise. Every time we align with the goodness of All That Is, or help another do so, life gets better; every time we or others move out of relation, life's challenges increase.

If all recognized that God is All That Is, treated others as the divine beings they are, respected our environment as that which gives life and is our sole provider, and otherwise moved into relation with All That Is, our experience of life would be very different. I think we would call it divine. This is the holy age that comes.

The vastness of All That Is

We have established the foundation that unifies scientific, philosophical, and religious perspectives. Even so, our view remains limited, for we're apt to demote All That Is to the level of reality we know, and this is a most grievous error. We need to recognize the difference between All That Is and all we perceive there to be.

When someone says ultimate reality, we may think they're talking about the world we know, but we don't know All That Is. What we know is a viewpoint developed by processing sensory information and establishing beliefs. This falls far short of the divinity that is.

Everything we know came to us through our senses, and all of this arrived as vibration. Light vibrations are picked up by our eyes and our mind processes what we see. Audio is interspersed sound and silence, and the mind processes these pulses into what we hear. All around us, sensory information arrives at our bodies and our nervous systems transmit this data to the mind for processing. This is sensory perception, and the rest of what we know is a product of mind, thought relating to what we perceive. Without perception, there would be nothing for mind to process, and without mind there would be no conceptual understanding, but the end result is not what exists; it is simply a viewpoint.

When we examine the world through the experiential layer, we may recognize a tree. Our mind processes color, audio, motion, and other information to determine this. When our knowledge is sufficient for navigation and interaction, processing stops. Our mind's input was sense data, and it combined this information to recognize a tree. This is how the reality we know comes to be.

Remarkable, isn't it? We don't make sense of reality; we make reality of sense. The vastness of God is hidden from awareness, so we navigate a world of metaphor that most of us think is real. But the world we know is not real; it is a thought-based representation.

Beneath the surface we comprehend as a tree, there is an infinite complexity. The tree is made of cells, each with its own life experience astoundingly different from our own. There are bugs within the tree, and their intricate complexities, birds with the vastness of their experience, and all of the tree's interactions with water, air, soil, sunlight, and more. There's the history of the near infinite count of protons, neutrons, and electrons that comprise the tree as well, and all of this exists within the infinities of both time and space.

The mind can never process the limitless vastness that exists, yet it is forever present. There is a boundless expanse that defies comprehension, an ultimate reality we only catch glimpses of. Welcome to All That Is, that which we can know of, yet never wholly know; welcome to God.

Lock in Your Enlightenment

Journal your profound discoveries

So often, we attempt to assess the validity of our schools before comprehending their content. We use judgement to determine which schools we engage, and which we surpass. Now that we understand what God is, we see that all sciences, theologies, and philosophies address the same thing. Every school of thought focuses on God and aspects therein, for this is All That Is, and there is nothing else.

It's time to pull out the personal journal we used with our first guidebook; we use it here as well. We have established the first of many deep understandings about God, and revealed the nature of spiritual, scientific, and other schools of thought. Let's record this alignment.

To help us break from past misperceptions, let's also perform a fun exercise. Record the many claims of God revealed in point form within this chapter. With each line, embrace the meaning and smile. The ancient wisdom is much less of a mystery already, and this is only chapter one.

Chapter 2: Genesis and beliefs

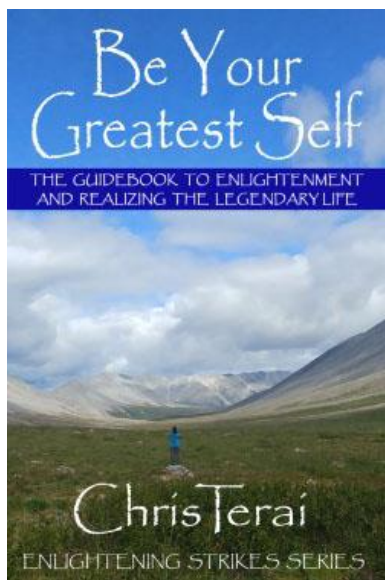

Every being starts with a belief system, and even before we first opened our eyes, we each were crafting ours. Sounds in the mother's belly were among our first experiences, and our minds catalogued every recognized pattern within them. We saw first light in birth, so light followed sound. As shapes moved within our vision and other senses fired off, we witnessed and catalogued every pattern, learning of sky, then environment, then finally categorizing beings as different from and akin to us. Eventually, these many understandings became a model of our tiny world, our first belief system. This was where the reality we know first began; it is where we all start.

Genesis scripture provides a most poetic account of this formation, first by detailing how God used sound to invoke light. The story continues with the formation of sky, establishing the first foundational beliefs. Scripture then details an emerging environment, and with the honing of senses, the newly discerned sun, stars, and moon. As concepts build within an infant self, sentient life is recognized as that which operates autonomously from the environment, so it is said that God created the many forms of life. Finally, beings are categorized to generate the concept of self and those like self. This process is purported to take about six days, after which the infant self has bearings and there is rest. This is the Genesis version of creation, the order in which beliefs form within a new life. It is the creation of you and of me, our individual perspective of God...

Our journey continues. Join us and explore the nature of divine life, embrace the holy spirit, and make unconditional love intrinsic. Then Redivine Life with infinite wisdom and claim the peace of God, quantum wisdom, power of the prophets, and more... all logically! Finally, leverage advanced views of the third section to fulfill the wholesome prophecies and make a heaven of earth.
